If you make passive income, you continue to earn money regularly, even if you don’t continue working for it or taking other action to generate the income. Passive income can be a traditional business, such as drop-shipping clothing or other products you sell through an ecommerce store, or a side hustle, such as writing eBooks and listing them on a sales platform. Passive income is an attractive way of earning because it doesn’t depend on your current ability to work. Blogging is another popular way of earning passive income. But there are many other ways to earn it and much more to understand about how it works. Here’s an example. You might sell digital products, earn royalties or engage in affiliate marketing. You can even tap into your social media followers to earn money. Many effective forms of earning passive income require you to have money to invest upfront or spend years cultivating and maintaining an online presence. If you’re laid off from that job, it’s no longer a source of income, and you’ll want to find another as you earn unemployment benefits. Active income is often limited to the number of hours you work, but passive income can earn you as much (or as little) money as a product or service sells. Although passive income may be considered less hassle than full-time employment, earning passive income isn’t always easy and the scenario described above isn’t the only example of what a passive income stream might look like. When you invest in stocks, for example, you earn money passively when the stocks’ values increase. Traditional active income is any money you earn from providing work, a product or a service to others.
